Not illustrated. 1914 Excerpt: . . . CHAPTER VI CAMP COOKING There is a favorite saying in camp, that the Lord sends grub, but the devil sends cooks. This expression is old and homely, but it is apt, and many times, when it is the turn of the greenest man in camp to get dinner, we find reason to consider it true. We have seen an old woodsman toss together a few ingredients and turn out a meal that would cause our stomachs to cry, Encore, encore, and we have most of us experienced the sad results from guides who pretended to be finished cooks and had the whole party homesick before they had been in camp three days. The best supplied camp cuisine in the world would not keep off the blue horrors when in the hands of such bunglers. Of course, everyone must first learn the how to do it, and equally of course some fail to ever learn. The latter could not boil water without burning it. I well remember my own first experience, and I remember, too, the experiences with some of the boys that I have tried to teach to cook. The genuine camper is, certainly, the man who, taking but little food with him, lives upon the spoils of his rod and gun. This is, in most cases, impracticable to the ordinary camper. In the first place, it takes some experience to do it. In the second place, but few desire to do so, and...
