Excerpt: . . . master and servant, and of enabling us, like Tellheim, to forgive all Justs faults. It lends his grotesque figure a touching dignity. Lessing was fond of dogs. He kept one at Breslau, and later at Brunswick he supported for five months an eccentric character who had shared his last crust with his starving dog. So long as I have a roll, said Lessing, he shall have half of it. Scene 9 brings out Justs loyalty in still stronger relief by contrasting it with the jaunty indifference of the fashionable lackey, who does not even know his mistresss name, and who is willing to betray her private affairs to any stranger. In Scene 11 we have the ring started on the road by which it is to fall into the hands of Minna and serve her purpose, its significance being suggested by Justs comments, --a...
