Not illustrated. 1902 Excerpt: .of the live cattle trade, the advantages that would accrue to the port by substantial additions to the sailing list of the American line, and the fact that another important line was expected to make Southampton a port of call shortly. Still more gratifying was the announcement that the South Western Company would always be to the fore in providing the necessary depth of water for the deepest vessels that science could build, and it was only natural that he should point out the duties of the local authorities to maintain a sufficient depth in the channel to enable the ships to come to the docks. There has always been deeper water in the channel than there is to be found at the quays, and, with co-operation on the part of the dock owners and the local authorities, there should be absolutely no difficulty or misunderstanding on that score. It does not require a very discerning person to see that great preparations are still going on at the docks to meet the requirements of the ever-increasing shipping traffic. A new dry dock, deepened and extended quays to the east and west of the estate, and continual dredging operations, all point to the same thing. Where om hugeliner is berthed to-day, it was possible to accommodate two or more ships a few years ago. When ocean liners ha e reached such large dimensions that they only run eight or nine to the mile, it can be...
